The local government of Lanao Kuran in Arakan Valley in North Corabato turned over a 50-hectare property to Brokenshire College. The area was formerly a logging concession and now totally denuded. The local government does not have the capacity to rehabilitate the area, which is 15 kilometers inland from the national highway in Calinan. It is a depressed community – consisting mainly of families belonging to the Manobo tribe – with no water facility, electricity and public transportation. The main means of transportation is a habal habal, a motorcycle that usually accommodates 4 persons and more with a makeshift bamboo pole. This is also used to transport crops, vegetables and other agricultural products to the market.

The road is rough and often muddy that people have to walk along the sides and cross an unfinished bridge across a river. Even a four-wheeler vehicle could get stuck in the mud.
Brokenshire College started an integrated development programme with components such as community health, education, farm development, environmental protection and management, and leadership development.

Faculty and students of Brokenshire College have a programme of community integration, and assist in providing various forms of services. Community integration is very important.
Community Health
Beneficiaries are mostly women and children. Children are taught basic health and sanitation.

Mothers and their babies are provided basic health services.

There are inputs on infant care, proper health and nutrition.
Education
An enhancement programme in education is undertaken in cooperation with the local public school and the community.

The greening of Lanao Kuran
Last year, we had provided support for the building of a multi-purpose center in the community.

Construction materials had to be brought from the city.

The building was constructed with a combination of concrete and indigenous materials.
It is used as a classroom for functional literacy, an area for different kinds of meetings, a health center and for various other purposes.
