

For Immediate Release
Friday, July 18, 2014

P3 Model Bad for Alberta Taxpayers

Lukaszuk's Appointed P3 Board Idea a 'Recipe for Corruption'

Edmonton - PC leadership candidate Thomas Lukaszuk's proposal to create a "secretariat" that would oversee negotiations of Private-Public Partnerships (P3s) ignores the reality that P3s cost more, deliver less, and could open the door to corruption.

In comments made to the Edmonton Journal, the former deputy premier admitted that P3 deals concerned him, and that he saw the potential for Albertans to be "taken for a ride." His proposed solution is to create a special cabinet-appointed board to oversee Private-Public Partnerships, and to negotiate on behalf of the province.

"I'm heartened to hear Mr. Lukaszuk expressing concerns over P3 funding — as I was heartened when the province decided to fund new school projects through traditional design-and-build financing," Alberta Federation of Labour president Gil McGowan said. "But his proposed solution could be a recipe for corruption, making it harder for the public to find out the details of the deals. It also gives a small group of appointed individuals — likely partisan political loyalists — the ability to sign off on multi-million dollar projects. I suspect that anyone who serves on this 'secretariat' would find a very comfortable landing in the private sector when they've served their term."

The P3 financing model has been repeatedly shown to be a bad deal for government and taxpayers. The Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives has found they carry significant risk to taxpayers, while also carrying higher costs than traditional financing. When the Alberta government hired an outside firm to conduct an analysis of P3s school construction, they found that the model was not in the best interest of Albertans.

Since 2003, the government has used the financing method to build large sections of Edmonton and Calgary's ring roads, as well as 41 schools and a water and sewer treatment plan in Kananaskis.

Under a P3 model, government signs a contract with a private partner who agrees to design, build, maintain, and sometimes operate, the project over a period of time. That private company finances some or all of the project, and the government repays the company, with interest, over a set term of several years.

.../2

“Bringing in a for-profit partner on these projects doesn’t create efficiencies, it just adds a pit to shovel tax dollars into,” McGowan said. “It’s only through secrecy, misdirection and shady accounting that they ever appear to be in the public interest. Creating a ‘secretariat’ to oversee P3 negotiations will just create more bureaucracy and less transparency.”

Link to Thomas Lukaszuk’s Comments:

<http://www2.canada.com/edmontonjournal/news/story.html?id=55f32292-01f7-4d85-b3cf-27dc94da35a2>

Unifor445/cope458

File: G:\Communications\NEWS\AFL\2014\Fact Check_P3 Model Bad for Alberta Taxpayers_2014Jul18.doc