

As health professionals, we experience first-hand the effects of climate change on health and well-being every day.

We are on the front line of worsening extreme weather events and increased incidence of infectious and vector borne diseases, increases in respiratory illnesses, as well as the mental health consequences of inaction and trauma following disasters.

Australians are already suffering from inaction on climate change, and we see it in escalating demands on emergency services, in pressure on our hospitals and primary healthcare services,

We call on the Federal Government to take real action on reducing emissions and properly supporting the health sector to be able to deal with this crisis.
