Amy has served as Executive Director of EFEC since July 2016. Her transition from the private to nonprofit sector was serendipitous to her involvement with her two sons' public school education and the discovery of Colorado's education funding deficits that continue to deteriorate society's fundamental, constitutional right to learn.

Amy has extensive experience in brand management, marketing strategy, business and account management that lends itself well to the needs of EFEC. However, her passion for equity in education and the recognition of how truly important the profession of teaching is to a thriving, thoughtful society that made her the right fit to lead this organization. Her desire to see all students, no matter what their economic or social background, as the best they can possibly be for their own success and the betterment of society as a whole, fuels her personal mission to drive the success of the organization. With tenacity and a lifelong love of learning, she continues to educate herself with a personal goal of running the best public education-focused nonprofit organization in her community, in the state of Colorado, and ultimately the nation.

In addition to a BS in Journalism-Advertising from the University of North Texas, Amy has earned a Certification in Nonprofit Management from Duke University, graduated from the El Pomar Nonprofit Executive Leadership Program, and works collaboratively with her nonprofit peers throughout the region to support students and teachers in Eagle County.

Prior to joining EFEC, Amy managed her own copywriting and marketing consultant business; VP of account services and senior copywriter for Spark Creative, a boutique advertising agency in Vail, Colorado; art director for Smith+Noble window treatment company in Southern California; and art director for Neiman Marcus Direct, in the design center of Dallas, Texas.
