Thank you so much.

On behalf of Chinese for Labour,
I want to say a very warm welcome and a happy New Year!

It is wonderful to be amongst so many friends - thank you for taking the time to be with us.

You know,
when I gave my welcome speech last year, I joked that thinking about the 12 months leading up to it ĭ losing the 2015 election, a Tory majority
and a Labour Party at war with itself ĭ had driven me to need a drink.

Another twelve months on,
and I’m not going to lie to you,
that joke has not aged well.

What a year since we met here last.
I won’t recount all that has happened — we don’t have that kind of time tonight.

I don’t think there has ever been a year like it in my lifetime.

I imagine the last time that the world was in such a state of flux as we find ourselves in today was in 1989 and the fall of the Berlin Wall.

Yet while that year felt like and was an enormous change in a very positive direction, that can’t be said to be true of the time we are living now.

Then the world seemed to be coming together, whereas now it seems to be splitting at the seams.

That’s not helped when every time you check the news there is a new shock, a new tremor or a new tweet by Donald Trump!
But those of you who know me, know that I’m an optimist.

Yes, the future is uncertain.

Yes, we’ve seen a return of a xenophobic, sometimes racist rhetoric and behaviour that we thought we’d seen the last of.

Yes, there is, right now,
an absence of a politics of hope strong enough to counter the growing force of a politics of fear.

But like some of you here tonight,
I remember what it used to be like.

I know that we’ve overcome these things before,
often in worse forms than they exist at the moment.

That doesn’t make the now any better for those who are suffering, or those who will,
but it does tell us that together
we can and will overcome.
This re-emergence of division is not the final destination.
As the last 25 years have shown:
there is no such thing as the End of History.

I subscribe much more to that old Martin Luther King quote that

*The arc of the moral universe is long,
and it bends towards justice.*

But it only bends that way because we — people of every walk of life — grab it in our hands
and bend it towards justice and towards progress.

After all —
that is what this great Labour Party was founded to do and has done each and every time
it has been in government.

That is why all of us are here — because we believe in the importance of justice and social progress,
and our ability to shape and secure it.

And despite being shocked — and quite possibly scarred — by the events of the last two years, we have to now re-double our efforts and determination.

Not only because the longer that we delay, the harder the task ō
but it is also now the Year of the Fire Rooster!

According to the Zodiac, the year 2017 will be dominated by the orientation towards progress, honour and increased integrity.

That may be hard to believe now that Nigel Farage has got his own radio show, but ō as ever ō
it is up to us to make it so!

The question for each of us must ask ourselves is ō are we up to it?

And so tonight,
I would like to make a simple observation about the challenge that lies ahead.

It is that we havenōt won the argument about how one views and measures the success and strength of a society, and that if we are going to grab that arc of the moral universe and bend it towards justice then we have to have and win that argument.

What do I mean by that?

Take the economy as an example.

It might have told us that the economy was booming
or in recovery,
but it didn't tell enough about the struggles of people in post-industrialised towns.

Take job numbers.

Under this Conservative government, total numbers may have grown,
but don't say anything about how all the risk of work has been transferred from business to the worker, increasing insecurity on those, for example,
who are on zero hour and exploitative contracts.

Businesses are seen to be growing,
but the truth is that all the benefits went to its bosses.
It leads to a needlessly antagonistic and combative society, with all of us being the poorer for it.

- We've seen it in the economy, where business leaders and workers are too often seen in opposite trenches, rather than working together for the long-term, sustainable benefit.

- We've seen it in the fall-out of the EU Referendum and the growing divide between those who voted leave and remain, where every call for moderation is treated as a betrayal of the result. Where even Supreme Court judges are called traitors for applying the law or Civil Servants feel they have to resign because they see difficulty ahead.

- And, of course, we've seen it on immigration, where a combination of media and right-wing politicians have over years painted this vicious, false picture of immigrants benefitting from the British public or abusing the British system.
A picture that incites people to blame.

As we know in Chinese for Labour – that immediate condemnation makes it harder to fight real discrimination and racism.

That is why we are supporting "Day without Us" on 20 February where all of us will come together to celebrate the contribution that migrants make.
- Come and join us

We contribute hugely to all aspects of life here in the UK from our economy to our businesses, arts and public services.

As China is poised to become the world's largest economy by 2030, through our shared heritage we can play a part in strengthening UK-China relations.

Making and winning important arguments are the keys to Labour's return to government: putting forward a compelling and muscular vision of the future that is about the success of all of us, not just that of some of us.
Winning that argument will allow us to take the courageous steps we need to take to re-build our society and to re-build Labour’s vote.

It will allow us to successfully challenge the current economic model.

We cannot accept globalisation as it is given the impact it has had on driving divisions within our society.

We have to say that shareholder value isn’t as important as the value of our citizens.

Especially given the impact of the rapid development of technology on the job market, we have to proactively invest in those things that will create jobs and enhance our shared life.

We have to be brave and bold in the investments we will make in infrastructure, roads, rail and housing.
They are the argument and the evidence for the role of government to be an investor in building our society's future.

And we have to challenge ourselves to put forward a platform that offers everyone in society opportunity and hope, because despair and hopelessness spreads through society like a disease.

An ambitious programme like this will be possible, if we win the argument for our vision of society.

If we don't, we will always be fighting on someone else's battlefield.

We might win some policy arguments, but we won't win the future.

Re-discovering our essential purpose of building the UK's society on a basis of mutuality and reciprocity may seem a simple concept but it is something we have forgotten.
in the cut and thrust of politics and the mania of the last year:

that politics is about our vision of how society should work and winning power
so we can implement deliverable policies that will ņ step-after-painful-step ņ realise it.

We find ourselves
at a historically challenging time, where what we hold dear is under threat.

Yet, seeing the friends, talent,
and colleagues around this room,
I believe that working together we can win a majority of this country to our vision of a society not in aggregate and not in silos ņ but a society built on the strength of our common endeavour and on the strength of the connections between us that make us British.

That is why
I am so proud to be Chair of Chinese for Labour, because we are up for the fight ņ working with every part of the Labour family.
That is why I must thank our incredibly hard working team, who this year won a Socialist Society of the Year Award for our work in combatting discrimination and hatred after Brexit.

And it’s why we are so grateful to you for your unstinting support we couldn’t do it without you.

Thank you and have a wonderful night
