Ranked-choice voting passes the test in Maine

Democrat Jared Golden (left), joined by wife Isobel, speaks to supporters as they wait for results in Maine's Second Congressional District election, in Lewiston on Nov. 6. Election officials declared Golden the winner Thursday after a federal judge denied Republican Representative Bruce Poliquin's request to halt tabulations under Maine's new ranked-choice voting system. (JOEL PAGE, AP)

Maine is a commonsensical kind of state, with a pragmatic, problem-solving outlook. Its experiment with ranked-choice voting, currently in the news for replacing the preliminary plurality winner with a more broadly popular choice in Maine's sprawling Second Congressional District, provides a useful electoral reform for other states to imitate.

If and when the Pine Tree State's new vote-tallying method survives a federal court challenge by a beleaguered incumbent, that is.

Ranked-choice voting may sound complicated, but it's really not. It's basically an instant runoff in contests where no candidate has secured a majority of the vote. In ranked-choice elections, citizens don't just vote for one candidate on Election Day. If they want, they can rank them all, in order of preference.

If no candidate wins a majority, the hopeful who received the least first-choice votes is dropped, and those votes are redistributed to the next choice of his or her voters. That process continues until enough candidates have been eliminated, and enough votes reallocated, to deliver one candidate a majority.

That's what happened in the Second District. In the initial results, Republican Bruce Poliquin held a lead of 2,632 votes over Democratic nominee Jared Golden, but with two independent candidates in the race, his tally amounted to only 46.4 percent of the vote cast, to 45.5 percent for Golden. When votes for the two independent candidates were reallocated, Golden had gained more than twice as many new votes as Poliquin. He ended up on top with 139,231 votes to Poliquin's 136,326, for a victory margin of 2,905 votes.

Maine, a state where elections frequently feature one or more independent candidates, has had unfortunate experiences with plurality winners. Combative, divisive Paul LePage first won the governorship in a multi-candidate race with a slender plurality of 37.6 percent, giving him a victory he almost certainly wouldn't have secured in a head-to-head contest. Because of a Maine constitutional issue, ranked-choice voting governs primaries, but doesn't apply in general elections for governor or for legislative seats. It is used in all primaries, however, and in general elections for federal offices.

The possible legal issues with ranked-choice voting aren't yet fully settled. Before the ranked-choice voting results were tabulated, Poliquin had gone to federal court seeking an injunction to prevent the redistribution of votes. A judge denied that, but the defeated Republican still intends to pursue a federal court challenge to the state law. Although Maine voters have twice embraced ranked-choice voting at the ballot, Poliquin maintains he is only trying to benefit Maine citizens — and oh yes, set an example for children.

"I'll tell you this would be a heck of a lot easier on me if I just walked away from this vote counting mess," he said. "But what kind of message would that send to our kids? Absolutely the wrong message."

Still, though his rationale is risible, Poliquin may be doing the cause of ranked-choice voting an unintended favor. This is the first congressional election in the country to be decided by ranked-choice. If other states adopt the system, a legal challenge to ranked-choice voting as it applies to federal elections is all but inevitable, so it may as well come now. If the courts uphold ranked-choice voting, as legal experts expect, that will clear up any uncertainty that might otherwise cloud its attractiveness as an electoral option.

Conservatives will of course grouse because, in this instance, ranked-choice resulted in a loss for Poliquin, the last Republican House member in New England. But the Second District will end up with a member of Congress more in sync with its wants. And ranked-choice voting could just as easily work in the GOP's favor in a contest where right-leaning independents split conservative votes that otherwise would have consolidated around the Republican nominee.

Ranked-choice voting isn't perfect. No system is. But a growing number of cities, from Cambridge to Minneapolis and St. Paul to San Francisco and Oakland, have implemented it. So far, Maine is the only state where it's used for congressional and statewide elections. Other states would do well to follow Maine's lead — including Massachusetts.

THE AMERICAN PROSPECT

RANKED-CHOICE VOTING

A Victory for Democratic Reform

LARRY DIAMOND

The voters of Maine rejected political cynicism on Tuesday and endorsed one of the most promising reforms to our politics.

In what may be looked back upon as the most important election in the United States in 2018, the voters of Maine rejected political cynicism on Tuesday and preserved ranked-choice voting (RCV) for its future elections. To appreciate the historic significance of this vote for greater democratic choice, it's important to understand what Mainers were up against—a two-party duopoly in which “all the levers of power” (in the words of one grassroots activist) were overtly or covertly working to block political reform.

This was not the first time the state's electorate had voted on RCV. In November 2016, by a 52-48 percent margin, Maine's voters approved an initiative to implement RCV for all future state and federal elections (save for President). They did what a growing number of U.S. cities have done—opt for more open electoral competition and increased political civility. But Maine's establishment politicians, particularly in the Republican Party, then set out to negate the will of the voters. There ensued an epic 19-month struggle about much more than voting rules. It became a crucial test case for grassroots political reform. Against all odds, the people prevailed over the politicians on Tuesday, and this time by double the margin (eight percentage points). That margin was aided (and possibly enabled) by tens of thousands of Maine independents, who came out to vote in the primary election even though the referendum on RCV was the only item on the ballot for which they were eligible to vote.

On the surface, it's hard to see why RCV causes such a storm among party die-hards. It is perfectly compatible with both political parties and party primaries. Indeed, under the initiative passed in 2016, RCV was used on Tuesday—for the first time in U.S. history, and to apparently considerable voter enthusiasm—in Maine's gubernatorial primary elections. Under RCV, voters can weigh the merits of several candidates, and candidates may need to appeal for the second- or third-preference votes of their rivals' supporters. If no candidate wins an outright majority, the candidate with the lowest number of first-place votes is eliminated, and the second-preference votes of his or her supporters are redistributed to the remaining candidates. The process continues until someone wins a majority.

But here's the rub—and the hope. By requiring a candidate to win a majority, and by implementing if necessary a series of “instant run-offs” until that happens, RCV opens up the electoral process to independents and third-party candidates. In the general election, voters no longer need to worry about “wasting” their votes on fresh, unconventional and long-shot options. They can “vote with their hearts” in casting their first-choice votes and then rank second or third the candidates who stir them less but are still preferable to the candidate or party they most oppose. When used to fill individual seats, RCV still requires a candidate to emerge with a majority. So it is far from a death blow to the two-party system. In fact, it would figure to enhance the legitimacy of the governor in Maine, where nine of the past 11 victors have failed to win a majority of the vote.

But given that Maine has elected independents in the past—including Angus King as governor and then U.S. Senator—and that independent Eliot Cutler almost won the governorship in 2010, the two parties were not eager to open this reformist can of worms.

Opposition was particularly intense among Maine's Republicans, whose current governor, Paul LePage, only narrowly beat Cutler (with a mere 58 percent of the vote) in 2010. Under RCV, LePage would probably not have been nominated in 2010, and he certainly would have lost the general election (and possibly his re-election bid, too). A "belligerent, foul-mouthed and polarizing governor" who told the NAACP to "kiss my butt" and compared the IRS to the Nazi Gestapo, LePage is a big part of the reason why Mainers came to feel the need for an "instant run-off" system to produce a more consensual majority winner. In 2016, he drove outrage to new levels when he alleged that black drug dealers "come up here" from Connecticut and New York to "sell their heroin" and "half the time they impregnate a young white girl before they leave." Such attitudes and comments have made him one of America's most disliked governors.

Nevertheless, Maine's Republican Party has waged a relentless political and legal campaign to bury RCV. Along the way, many of the state's Democrats also publicly or surreptitiously joined the effort, not wanting to risk losing a future governor's race to an independent. Initially, the party establishments argued that the new voting method would be confusing to the voters and costly to implement and administer, or even (somehow) undemocratic. Some warned that voter confusion would diminish turnout. When none of this proved consistent with the available evidence—which has seen RCV work well in roughly a dozen U.S. municipalities, for over a century to elect the house of Australia's parliament, and successfully to nominate and select Hollywood's Oscar winners as well—and when Maine's voters adopted RCV in 2016, the opponents switched tacks. They charged that RCV violated Maine's state constitution, which requires that state general elections be decided by plurality vote. In a May 2017 advisory opinion, Maine's State Supreme Court agreed, but it left intact the use of RCV for all primary elections and for general elections for U.S. Senate and House seats. Rather than amend the state constitution to comply with the voters' will, or just let the court's mixed outcome stand, the legislature then seized the opportunity to kill RCV altogether. In October, it passed a law suspending implementation of RCV and giving Maine's voters until December 2021 to amend the constitution. Since that requires two-thirds of each legislative house (before it even goes to Maine's voters), this was a thinly veiled way of terminating RCV for all elections in Maine, forever.

But the people of Maine did not go quietly into that good night. Unique among American states, Maine's constitution provides for something called "the people's veto referendum." It enables any six registered voters to submit a proposed veto of a legislative bill to the Secretary of State, who then has ten working days to certify it. After that, advocates have 90 days from the end of the legislative session (in this instance, the same day the bill was passed) to gather the requisite number of signatures of registered voters (over 61,000) to place the referendum on the ballot. The state legislature passed the poison bill on October 23 in the middle of the night, in a special one-day session called for that lone purpose. That ensured the vote would take place in a primary election, when independents (who would be most likely to support RCV) would have no candidates to vote for. The timing was also nearly ideal for undermining a grassroots signature drive, which would have to wrestle with the Thanksgiving and Christmas holidays and the depths of a harsh Maine winter.

But there was one potential silver lining. Ten working days from October 24—when the request to circulate petitions was filed with Secretary of State Matthew Dunlap—was a municipal election day in Maine, November 6, 2017. This still provided an opportunity to stand outside polling stations and collect signatures for the new petitions—if the Secretary of State released them in time. But Dunlap waited until 4:30 p.m. the day before to release the ballot question, and then with a wording of the proposition so convoluted that an ordinary voter could hardly determine from the text alone whether restoring RCV meant a “yes” or “no” vote. Nevertheless, instantly, within three minutes of Dunlap’s release and with just 14 hours until the opening of the polls, the grassroots campaign for the people’s veto began electronically sending out the petitions across the state to copy shops for duplication and then drove them to volunteer gatherers throughout the night. On Election Day, due to superior organization and determination, they obtained 33,000 voter signatures.

Some 1,800 volunteers continued to gather signatures through brutally cold days in December and January—with Portland’s highs hovering at or mercilessly well below freezing. “Every week it was another blizzard, and there was even a weather phenomenon called a bomb cyclone,” said Cara McCoemick, whose Chamberlain Project managed the campaign along with Kyle Bailey and the Committee for Ranked Choice Voting. “Our fingers were frozen to the bone; we had to go into our cars to warm up.” Voters asked, “Didn’t we already vote for this a year ago? Why do we have to sign this again?” The political shenanigans of the establishment frustrated people, but it also fired them up. Even people and opinion leaders who hadn’t voted for RCV the first time signed up for the second round. It had become not just a question of electoral method but of whether a bunch of politicians could simply trash the popular will.

When the petitions were due on February 2 of this year, the campaign handed in over 77,000 signatures. As momentum gathered during the signature drive and the advocacy campaign that followed, the campaign drew the support of Phish drummer Jon Fishman, who lives in Lincolnville and staged a supporting concert, and in the final days, the actress, Jennifer Lawrence, the New York Times editorial board, and two Nobel-prize-winning economists. It also raised over a million dollars in funding, much of it from national philanthropists seeking democratic reform. National political reform activist Peter Ackerman chaired the Chamberlain Project.

Once the signatures were certified, the state was obligated to suspend the legislature’s repeal and implement RCV in this past Tuesday’s primary election. Through their vote on the people’s veto referendum, Maine’s voters would then decide if RCV would ever be used again. Yet even for its first conditional use in the primary election, the opposition to RCV would not die. The Committee for Ranked Choice Voting had to keep going back to court to compel the Secretary of State and the state government to implement RCV in the primary. Opponents of RCV said funding was lacking and the legal basis for moving forward was conflicting. In an opinion on April 4, Superior Court Judge Michaela Murphy rejected those arguments and ordered the state to proceed with RCV, declaring, “Clarity, stability and public confidence are essential to ensure the legitimacy of Maine elections.”

When the Republican Party failed to get Maine’s Supreme Judicial Court to stop the use of RCV in the primary, it voted at its May 4 convention to change its rules to require a plurality vote to choose its nominees. Then it filed a lawsuit in federal court claiming its First Amendment right of free association entitled it to reject the use of RCV in the primary. That bid failed, too. In a May 24 editorial, the Portland Press Herald noted the absurdity of this supposedly principled claim, given that "the Maine Republican Party selects its own state officers with a series of runoff elections that is a functional twin to the same ranked-choice voting law that the party charges would violate its members' rights." Finally, as Maine's voters headed to the polls on Tuesday, Governor LePage declared ranked-choice voting—not terrorism, poverty, the opioid crisis, the ballooning deficit, or North Korea's nuclear weapons—but RCV "the most horrific thing in the world," and he threatened not to certify the election—an option he legally does not have.

Along with a growing number of municipalities, political scientists, thoughtful media, and democratic reformers, I have come to think that ranked-choice voting is the single most promising achievable reform for making our politics more open, more civil, more democratic, and more amenable to compromise. But I am a social scientist and a pragmatist, not a religious devotee of this one reform. Let's try it and see how it works—as we have tried the "top two" system in California and discovered its many unpleasant side effects. Let's try variations of RCV, even in multi-member districts for state legislature (though I have my serious reservations about that).

But here is what we should not do. We should not let a narrow, out-of-touch political class block a promising reform with half-truths and cynical maneuvers, simply so they can hold on to the continued prospect of victory with thin pluralities or half-hearted majorities of the vote, due to artificial barriers to competition. We are entering a new era of political reform in the United States, driven, like the last big one of a century ago, from the bottom up. And the voters of Maine have just given this movement its most courageous and inspiring victory.

One Reform to Save America

By David Brooks Opinion Columnist
May 31, 2018

There are a bunch of different ways to do democracy. In Western Europe, most countries have proportional representation and a lot of different parties representing voter interests. In this country we've gone with a two-party system and winner-take-all elections.

During the middle of the 20th century, it seemed like we'd chosen the right approach. The proportional multiparty system allowed an extremist named Adolf Hitler to rise to power with the initial support of a tiny fraction of Germany's voters. Both American parties, meanwhile, seemed to bend toward compromise, knowing they had to win over the median voter in order to get to 50.1 percent majorities.

But even then, as Lee Drutman of the think tank New America points out, America really had a four-party system. There were liberal Republicans from places like the Northeast and conservative Republicans from the West. There were liberal Democrats on the coasts and conservative Democrats from the South. The four groups floated into different legislative coalitions depending on the issue and the moment, allowing for flexible bipartisan majorities.

Now the two-party system has rigidified and ossified. The two parties no longer bend to the center. They push to the extremes, where the donor bases and their media propaganda arms are. More and more people feel politically homeless, alienated from both parties and without any say in how the country is run.

Moreover, the whole way of practicing politics has been transformed. Each party imagines that it is one wave election from destroying the other side and gaining total power. Therefore, as Drutman notes, there's no interest in compromise, just winning and losing, gloating and seething.

Partisans' chief interest is in proving that the other party is despicable — in ramping up fear, hatred and the negative polarization that is the central feature of contemporary American politics.

The result is that people, especially the young, lose faith in democratic norms altogether. There are over 6,000 breweries in America, but when it comes to our politics, we get to choose between Soviet Refrigerator Factory A and Soviet Refrigerator Factory B.

The good news is that we don't have to live with this system. There's nothing in the Constitution that says there have to be only two parties. There's nothing in the Constitution about parties at all. There's not even anything in the Constitution mandating that each congressional district have only one member and be represented by one party. We could have a much fairer and better system with the passage of a law.

The way to do that is through multimember districts and ranked-choice voting. In populous states, the congressional districts would be bigger, with around three to five members per district. Voters would rank the candidates on the ballot. If no candidate had a majority of first-place votes, then the candidate with the fewest first-place votes would be eliminated. Voters who preferred that candidate would have their second-choice vote counted instead. The process would be repeated until you get your winners.

This system makes it much easier for third and fourth parties to form, because voting for a third party no longer means voting for one with no chance of winning. You get a much more supple representation of the different political tendencies that actually exist in the country.

The process also means that people with minority views in their region have a greater chance to be represented in Congress. A district in Southern California, for example, might elect a Bernie Sanders-type progressive, a centrist business Democrat and a conservative.

The current system — wherein a vast majority of seats are safely red or blue and noncompetitive, with only a handful of fiercely contested districts — disappears. Every district becomes a swing district, each vote much more important. Congress begins to work differently because with multiple parties you no longer have stagnant trench warfare — you have shifting coalition-building.

There's a reason voters in proportional representation countries are less disenchanting with politics than we are. Their systems work better.

Over the last few decades, a lot of work has been done to fight gerrymandering, a reform that would have only a marginal effect on our politics. The good news is that attention seems to be shifting to ranked-choice voting, a change that would have much bigger and better effects.

In 2016, voters in Maine passed a referendum installing ranked-choice voting. The state's Legislature has done everything it can to fight it, but it looks like voters there will use the system for their June 12 primary, and have a chance to make the system permanent.

Representative Don Beyer of Virginia introduced legislation in Congress last year to make this kind of system national. Groups like FairVote champion the reform nationwide, and writers like Drutman are tireless advocates.

Right now our politics is heading in a truly horrendous direction — with vicious, binary political divisions overlapping with and exacerbating historical racial divisions. If we're going to have just one structural reform to head off that nightmare, ranked-choice voting in multimember districts is the one to choose.

Multiple choice

In praise of ranked-choice voting

A simple reform might fix America's dysfunctional politics

Print edition | United States >

Jun 14th 2018 | PORTLAND, MAINE

“A LIBERAL,” said Robert Frost, an American poet, “is a man too broad-minded to take his own side in a quarrel.” An ad released less than a week before election day by Mark Eves and Betsy Sweet (pictured above), opponents in Maine’s Democratic gubernatorial primary, seemed a paragon of Frostian liberalism. Ms Sweet, who resembles a slightly less caffeinated Elizabeth Warren, urged her supporters to vote for Mr Eves; while Mr Eves asked his supporters to back Ms Sweet. On election day the two gripped and grinned together outside an elementary school in Portland’s lovely West End.

In fact, their alliance was not wet leftism; it was a strategic gambit. On June 12th Maine conducted the first-ever statewide election using ranked-choice voting (RCV), in which voters rank the entire field rather than just voting for a single candidate. Trailing in the polls, Ms Sweet and Mr Eves figured they could boost their chances by campaigning for second-place votes.

RCV has long been a darling of political scientists. But Maine's experiment should interest anyone frustrated by America's crippling partisan politics. RCV may be unable to force liberals and conservatives to like each other, but it could at least blunt the electoral effects of hyperpartisanship.

RCV is not new. Australia has used it for a century, Malta and Ireland for slightly less. Some Oscar winners are chosen by RCV, as are prizewinners at the World Science Fiction Convention. Several American cities—including Minneapolis, San Francisco, Portland (Maine) and Santa Fe—have recently adopted it, too. In an RCV election, voters rank the field by preference, from first to last (though they can always choose to vote for just one candidate). If one candidate gathers a majority of first-place votes when all votes are in, he wins. If not, the candidate with the smallest number of first-choice votes is eliminated, and his secondary, tertiary and so forth votes are redistributed. That process continues until one candidate eventually has a majority.

How long that takes varies. San Francisco's mayoral race took place on June 5th but the winner was not confirmed until June 13th. By contrast, three years ago Ethan Strimling won a majority of votes outright in Portland, Maine's mayoral race. As The Economist went to press, Sean Moody appeared to have won the Republican governor's race outright, while Janet Mills held a steady lead on the Democratic side.

RCV boosters say it changes campaigns and elections in three laudable ways. First, it encourages voter turnout. A study of 79 elections in 26 American cities found that RCV was associated with a 10% increase in turnout compared with non-RCV primary and run-off elections, and San Francisco's race had the highest primary turnout in years. Voters turned off by the front-runners have less incentive to stay home. They can give their first-choice vote to their favourite candidate, even if he might be a quixotic choice, while allocating their other choices strategically.

Second, it shifts incentives away from negative campaigning—because candidates are trying not just to turn out their base, but also to win as many second- and third-choice votes as possible—and towards alliance-building, as Mr Eves and Ms Sweet demonstrate. Finally, boosters argue that introducing RCV limits the efficacy, and therefore the amount, of money spent by single-issue campaign groups, because they often finance negative ads.

In theory, RCV elections will more often be won by candidates broadly acceptable to most voters. Kyle Bailey and Cara McCormick, who have led Maine's RCV campaign, said they have staged dozens of mock RCV beer elections in microbreweries (which abound in Maine: winter here is long, cold and dark) to show voters how the process works. Mr Bailey said the loudest backers would often argue for oyster stout, or some other niche beer style, but the most votes would inevitably accrue to a "middle-of-the-road IPA"—which perhaps had fewer or less ardent fans, but which everyone could drink.

Opponents argue that RCV is too complicated—and indeed, in Maine, people's enthusiasm for RCV sometimes outstrips their ability to explain it. (Though on election day Maine's secretary of state, whose office released a detailed video explaining RCV, said he had received no complaints about ballot complexity.) RCV support in the state has split along party lines: Republicans largely opposed it, while the RCV campaign's watch party offered six types of Kombucha (fermented tea) on tap.

Paul LePage, the abrasive and bombastic outgoing governor, won two elections without a majority, thanks to liberals splitting their vote. Perhaps Maine Republicans doubt their ability to appeal to a majority of voters, and instead must discourage turnout while pandering to their own base? The state party filed an unsuccessful lawsuit in May, tortuously arguing that RCV impinged on their rights of association under the First Amendment.

After Maine's voters approved RCV by referendum in 2016, Republicans in the legislature narrowly passed a bill blocking its implementation. But backers gathered enough signatures—in a frenzied, dead-of-winter campaign across the state—to pass a "people's veto" that retained RCV in this election, and asked Maine's voters on this year's ballot whether they wanted to use it again. Guardedly optimistic as results filtered in on election night, Ms McCormick vowed that, if Maine voters approved it (and it looks as if they did), she and her colleagues would take their campaign to more states. Get ready to rank, America.
