

Bill 47 – Making Ontario Open for Business Act

BACKGROUND

Repealing our New Workplace Laws

In October 2018, the Ontario government tabled the Making Ontario Open for Business Act (Bill 47), repealing significant gains made in the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act (FWBJA). A summary of the proposed changes to the Labour Relations Act (LRA) is provided below.

Workplace Information

The reality is that workers cannot make an informed decision about their right to join a union if they are not able to communicate with each other.

Currently, Ontario workers seeking to form unions can access workplace information (i.e., employee names, phone numbers, and personal email addresses) if they can demonstrate 20 per cent support from workers in the proposed bargaining unit.

- Bill 47 repeals all provisions related to disclosing workplace information – even affecting applications currently before the labour board and those granted under the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act.

Under the Ford government, workers are denied access to information and encounter an exceptionally high threshold to organize collectively.

Bargaining Unit Structure

Currently, newly certified workplaces can be combined with other existing unionized workplaces – with the same employer and same union – to strengthen worker power.

- Bill 47 repeals this provision and instead allows employers to influence workers' bargaining agent.

Under the Ford government, workers can be denied continued representation by their own union, undermining their right to choose their own bargaining agent.

Card-based Certification

Most workers in Ontario are forced to vote twice to show that they want to join a union. From the first show of support to when the ballots are cast, the situation can drastically change for workers because of potential employer coercion and harassment.

Currently, only the construction, the temp agency, the building services, and the home care and community services industries allow workers to unionize through card-based certification, where workers vote once.

- Bill 47 repeals card-based certification in the latter three industries – leaving the construction industry as the sole sector left in Ontario to unionize workers through this process.

Under the Ford government, vulnerable workers will find it increasingly difficult to access a union.

Remedial Certification

The reality is that some employers commit unfair labour practices, coercing or intimidating workers into rejecting the union during an organizing drive.

Currently, the law recognizes that in cases where the LRA is contravened, it is virtually impossible to redress the employer's actions and make a second vote meaningful.

- Bill 47 reinstates provisions that make it harder for a union to be remedially certified.

Under the Ford government, workers' constitutional right to join a union can be undermined by the unlawful actions of employers.

Successorship Rights

Most unionized contract workers are vulnerable to contract flipping, often losing both their collective agreement and their bargaining rights if the service contract covering their worksite changes hands. This is the case even if the new contract provider hires the same employees to perform the same work in the same location.

- Bill 47 repeals the potential to extend successorship rights beyond the building services industry.

Under the Ford government, most unionized workers in contract service industries will have no protections against contract flipping.

Return-to-Work

The LRA outlines its intent to protect a worker's right to return to work following a legal strike or lockout. Prior to the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, this right was restricted to the first six months – after which employers were able to make the case that workers no longer had the right to reinstatement.

- Bill 47 reinstates the six-month restriction on the right of employees to return to work.

Under the Ford government, workers standing up for better working conditions have minimal protections.
