Suburbs Told Again They Must Help the Core City

By TRUDY MAHONEY
Times Staff Writer

GLASTONBURY — The suburbs, including this town, have been told by government officials in Hartford not to expect to be bailed out by the state. In addition, they have been told to expect government officials to come to them with a series of programs which will require them to spend a great deal of money, according to state tax law. This, one official said, is a 5-week internship in Glastonbury this summer.

According to the municipal services agency in the Hartford Community Development Agency, the money of the people are locked into Hartford City because of the Glastonbury

The money can be used only for towns that have

Moohey said it is more difficult to provide the needed social services and recreation programs to the

Moohey's first week here was to interview each department head, to get an overview of their functions. Seven weeks later, he Moohey said the town should begin making plans now for the town's future. He said the town should begin looking into the feasibility of the town building committee's current project, as well as current planning on the town's budget for future programs.

Glastonbury

Moohey has also tried to attend as many civic meetings as possible to get an overview of the town's current problems. He found this to be particularly valuable because he received a lot of tips on what citizens groups do.

In speaking to the town, Moohey had a lot of trouble finding the right person to speak to. The town manager, the assistant manager, the chief of the state department of health, and a number of other officials were all interested in the town. He said he believe that after they find a suitable person, they will have a better idea of how to get the help they need.