That report further pointed out the high child poverty rate isn't limited to Toronto with paper.

The 2016 Toronto Vital Signs Report released earlier this year, which offers a snapshot of health and well-being for the city, found that one-third of families with children under age 18 in Toronto are living below the low-income cut-off. The report also found that the colour of change, reveals 133,000 children in Toronto continue to live in poverty, according to a new report released on Monday. The new numbers come as Toronto City Council faces the possibility of $600 million in cuts as part of its budgeting process for the 2017 fiscal year. Aid Society of Toronto said. “Now is definitely not the time to reduce city spending, said report co-author Michael Polanyi of the Children’s Aid Society of Toronto. “We hope the report will put the 133,000 Toronto children living in poverty front-of-mind for all GTA leaders.”

“Despite Toronto’s booming housing market and significant wealth, more than one in four children is living in poverty,” report co-author Michael Polanyi of the Children’s Aid Society of Toronto said. “Now is definitely not the time to reduce city spending, especially for low-income families who are having a hard time making ends meet.”

The city of Toronto continues to hold the unenviable spot of having the highest percentage of children living in low-income families among Canada’s major cities, according to a new report released on Monday. The study, which looked at 2014 data and was co-released by Children’s Aid Society of Toronto and the United Way, found that 33% of children in the city were living in poverty, a rate that is significantly higher than the national average of 26.8%.

Toronto is known as the “Vital City” and is often recognized for its economic growth and cultural diversity. However, the report highlights the stark reality of child poverty in the city, with one in three children living in poverty. This is a significant issue that needs to be addressed in order to ensure that all children have access to the basic necessities of life.

The report also calls for a more comprehensive approach to addressing child poverty, including increased funding for critical services and programs. It highlights the need for a multi-sectoral approach that includes government, community organizations, and individuals in order to create sustainable solutions.

The report also highlights the importance of early childhood education and the need for increased funding for this sector. It calls for a decrease in the number of children living in poverty and for the government to take action to address this issue.

In conclusion, the report highlights the pressing need for action to address child poverty in Toronto. It calls for increased funding for critical services and programs, a multi-sectoral approach, and increased funding for early childhood education. It is crucial that we work together to create sustainable solutions to ensure that all children have access to the basic necessities of life.
