Fiona Robertson, disability activist, writes...

Voting Tory may well be a vote for Brexit, but it is also unquestionably a vote for certain death for some, and permanent damage to the health of tens of thousands of disabled people.

Never, ever forget that. If you do it again, if you do this to us again, we will never forgive you. You can't pretend you don't know, that other things are more important, that it's not the killing of disabled people you're voting for really; it's the other stuff.

The point of civic nationalism is that we have to take responsibility for the choices we make as part of a society. We cannot say "I didn't know", or "I care about this bit but not the other bits".

There were 30,000 extra deaths in 2015 in England & Wales a result of cuts to health and social care, according to research by Oxford University. There were hundreds of suicides by the very lowest estimates.

More than 50,000 people have lost their motability vehicles and become chronically isolated. People going through the Work Capability Assessment have experienced "almost universal" mental health damage, frequently permanent.

On the morning after the last General Election, my fellow disability activists and I spent an unrelenting few days tag-teaming as we tried to keep people in our community alive. We were not always successful. Over and over, hour after hour, we saw iterations of the same message: "I do not think I will survive this government."
