United for a Fair Economy believes that real change requires a strong, sustained grassroots movement that unites Americans across all walks of life—labor unions, faith-based groups, low-wage worker networks, immigrants’ rights groups, wealthy allies, and others—in the fight for economic justice. We work at the intersection of culture, art, and activism to expose the root causes of extreme inequality and challenge the prevailing myths and policies that support the current economic power structure.

“We make the rules of the economy and we have the power to change those rules.” – Robert Reich

In this Annual Report for 2013, we share a snapshot of this work: some of the inspiring stories and successes that you have made possible this year. Together, with you and social justice activists across the U.S., we are creating a resilient, sustainable, and just economy for everyone, not just those at the top.

Thank you for being a part of the journey.
Real Change: One Teacher’s Story

In 2011, Brian attended one of United for a Fair Economy’s flagship Training of Trainers institutes in South Haven, Minnesota. At the time, he was an English teacher at a high school in Southern California, not far from the border with Mexico. At the training, Brian joined 20 other educators, union leaders, and community organizers from across the US for UFE’s intensive course in popular economics, the language and analysis of economic inequality made accessible for everyone. This four-day institute was only the beginning.

Months later, in February 2012, Jeanette Huezo, a UFE Popular Economics Educator since 2001, arrived at Brian’s school. During her two-day stay, Jeannette led two workshops for Brian’s young students, many of whom are undocumented and, themselves, no strangers to the bruising consequences of economic inequality. Jeannette offered a powerful counterpoint to the misleading tales Brian’s students had been learning about the sources of economic opportunity and social mobility in our country. In Brian’s own words, the curriculum used by the high school’s social studies and economics teacher “promotes overtly racist ideas and places blame and shame on individuals instead of on systems, public policy, or historical inequalities.”

Inspired by Jeannette’s teachings and armed with United for a Fair Economy’s own book, The Self-Made Myth, and signature annual "State of the Dream" reports, Brian and his students decided to re-think their education. As Brian told us:

"We did an entire unit last year on White privilege and the racial wealth divide. The culminating project was that each student wrote a letter to our Social Studies Department Chair explaining why it is necessary for the economics teachers to discuss White privilege when they were discussing wealth."

It’s “necessary” because—as the inequalities of one generation are passed onto the next—the typical Black and Latino family still has less than 13 cents for every dollar of net wealth Whites have. And it’s these often-overlooked systems of inequality that United for Fair Economy exposes and examines in our "State of the Dream" reports and other publications, popular economics workshops, and creative advocacy work.

The high school’s reinvented social studies curriculum matters. In the classroom, there is now room for Latino and Latina students to see their own American experience reflected in their education. And this is empowering:

“9 of our students have won the Gates Scholarship in the past 4 years. 11 of our students were admitted to UC Berkeley this year. And they are all excited about taking classes in Latin American History, Chicano Studies, Women’s Studies, Education, and Ecology & Environmental Sciences."

Brian’s story and that of his students exemplifies how broad-scale change can take hold over time. By bringing the gospel of economic change home to communities most marginalized and disenfranchised by our lopsided economic system, UFE is empowering existing social justice advocates and breeding new ones. This is but one of many examples of how United for a Fair Economy is working with constituents and change advocates to bring about real, systemic change. This is the movement for a fair economy in a microcosm. This is the movement for a fair economy in action.
Changing Public Policy

After years of work on the estate tax, UFE’s Responsible Wealth Project and our Federal Tax Initiative, with the help of Bill Gates, Sr. and other prominent wealthy leaders, led the fight during the fiscal cliff negotiations to successfully enact the first increase in the estate tax rate in 28 years.

The effort began immediately following the 2012 election, when UFE and RW initiated the Responsible Estate Tax Proposal and recruited 36 initial signers, including Bill Gates, Sr., Warren Buffett, President Jimmy Carter, George Soros, Robert Rubin, John Bogle, Abigail Disney, and Robert Reich. We announced the proposal during a national teleconference on December 11, 2012, which was featured in more than 100 media outlets across the country, including The New York Times, CNBC, CNN Money, and Forbes. Before the teleconference, the estate tax had been almost universally ignored; afterwards, the estate tax and the proposal put forward by UFE and Responsible Wealth became part of the larger debate in Congress and around the country.

“...If the world I leave behind is one of gated communities, growing inequality and misery among the have-nots, downward mobility for the middle class, a degraded environment and a rotting social and physical infrastructure, then my children’s inheritance will be a shabby one indeed—no matter how much money they get.”

- Richard Rockefeller, heir to Standard Oil founder, John D. Rockefeller

Changing the Public Dialogue

Through creative reports and social media, UFE continues to debunk false, but salient national myths about the origins of wealth and success in our economy and the levels of racial and economic disparity in the US.

Born on Third Base (September 2012) uses the metaphor of baseball to show that most of the Forbes 400 members are not self-made, as Forbes claims, but actually inherited their wealth and thus were “born on third base,” or even home plate. The release of the report, timed to coincide with the annual Forbes 400 report, included creative use of social media and an engaging action campaign to encourage Forbes to tell a more complete story about wealth. Forbes issued an immediate response.

The State of the Dream 2013: A Long Way Home, our 10th annual report, released in January 2013, documents how current federal efforts to promote home ownership—tax expenditures in particular—disproportionately go to those who need the help least. The report recommends a stronger set of policies to promote and support housing as a human right, along with wealth-building strategies that are targeted to those who need it most.

Change in the States

UFE’s Tax Fairness Organizing Collaborative (TFOC) held its annual Raise the Roots Conference in June 2013 in Boston, MA, attended by over 70 organizers representing organizing groups from 18 states across the country. This year’s conference—the largest to date—featured interactive workshops about using film, art, media, and creative action to more effectively engage communities and involve new constituencies on issues of economic inequality and progressive tax policy. The conference kicked off with an advance screening of Robert Reich’s acclaimed new feature film, Inequality for All, which offers an eye-opening and highly accessible analysis of growing wealth inequality in the U.S.

I think [this proposal] is a reasonable compromise between where we are now and going all the way back to 2001 levels. - John C. Bogle

Now that the fiscal cliff debates are coming to a conclusion, Responsible Wealth—a network of business leaders and other wealthy citizens, including Bill Gates Sr., Warren Buffett and George Soros—is speaking out in favor of returning to an estate-tax structure more reminiscent of that of the pre-Bush years. "We need substantial revenue for deficit reduction, public investment and providing economic security. A substantial estate tax can provide some of that revenue with no meaningful adverse impacts." - Robert Rubin

As individuals and families that have benefited most significantly from public investments and a strong society, we are proud to have the opportunity to contribute back to the country that helped to make our success possible," the group said in its statement for a "responsible estate tax proposal."

"My grandfather Roy and his brother Walt both made their fortunes because of the American system, because there was funding for infrastructure, roads, highways, and regulations...I have no desire to compound my already significant advantages, especially not on the backs of the middle class." - Abigail Disney

"As individuals and families that have benefited most significantly from public investments and a strong society, we are proud to have the opportunity to contribute back to the country that helped to make our success possible," the group said in its statement for a "responsible estate tax proposal."

"We think Obama's proposal leaves too much on the table. If the estate tax law reverts to the $1 million exemption/55% rate, that would bring in $536 billion over the next decade. By comparison, Obama's proposal would bring in $256 billion less. We're trying to find somewhere in between." - Mike Lapham, Responsible Wealth Director
